ABSTRACT

This paper examines the current state of statutes in the United States as they relate to cyber-harassment in the context of “revenge porn”. Revenge porn refers to websites which cater to those wishing to exploit, harass, or otherwise antagonize their ex partners using pornographic images and videos which were obtained during their relationships. The paper provides examples and illustrations as well as a summary of current statutes in the United States. The paper additionally explores some of the various legal remedies available to victims of revenge pornography.

Keywords: cyber-harassment, cyber-bullying, revenge pornography, legal statutes, cyber-crime

1. INTRODUCTION

Currently, according the Center for Disease Control surveys, 48% of American marriages end in divorce [2]. This doesn’t include breakups, splits, departures, and other happenings which occur in non-formalized relationships among adults and minors throughout the course of one’s life. Almost every human at some point in their life will experience a relationship which fails. This may include an infatuation, love affair, or any other sort of involvement with another human being. When these separations occur, individuals on both sides may experience anger and hostility which can even result in violence and other manifestations. Cyber-bullying and cyber-harassment may be defined as:

...acts of aggression through computers, cell phones, and other electronic devices [3].

Given that the CDC study [4] produced 20 persons per minute who were the victims of intimate partner violence, it seems to follow that cyber harassment is likely to exceed those levels of violent acts as the perceived harm from posting illicit images and video should not be as great.

This paper focuses on a specific example and as such has some limitation in attempting to create a general model of legal response to such events. In addition, while some discussion in the paper is dedicated to handling of evidence and best practice, we would also like to refer the reader to additional resources such as the National Institute for Justice guides [32][33], and the United States Secret Service guide [34] which contain common best practice guidelines for the reader and attorney as they begin to consider such cases.

The objective of the paper is to introduce a specific scenario and some suggested terms in dealing with that scenario which may inspire future research and or thinking by the legal community on mechanisms with which to approach these sorts of cases as they increase in number across the world. The focus of this work is in the area of revenge pornography, which the paper defines, and subsequently provides some strategy for the reader in attempting to deal with the response to this in both forensic and legal terms. The reader is also introduced to various legal statutes and case law which may provide a starting point for response to a particular client experiencing this issue.

Cyber-harassment, cyber-bullying, and revenge pornography are constantly growing as threats to both adults and children. As both individuals and institutions attempt to find legal methods to respond to these horrifying scenarios, it will require flexibility and adept strategy to maneuver amongst the incredibly fluid nature of web design, internet behavior, and criminal creativity.

All of these behaviors, including trolling are continually rising with increasing use of the internet and the development of ever more sophisticated web presences [29]. Attorneys, private investigators, and forensic examiners, not to mention law enforcement will see a continual rise in cases requiring attention in this realm. This paper, while certainly not a complete primer on the matter, attempts to simply introduce the reader to the area and provide an example which may be used as a starting point to develop guidelines.

2. WHAT IS REVENGE PORNOGRAPHY?

We define revenge pornography, which may also be called “involuntary” or “non-consensual| pornography, as:

The dissemination or posting sexually explicit media without the consent of the individual in the media, particularly where the intent is to shame, humiliate, and frighten the person or otherwise cause them harm.

According to the Cyber Civil Rights Initiative (CCRI), one in ten ex-partners have threatened to expose risqué photos of their ex on line. Sixty percent of those who threatened to expose photos actually followed through with their threats. Those people that post photos of their ex’s also post identifying information on revenge porn sites resulting in harassment for the victims in the photos [5].

3. THE CASE OF ‘LEE’

Lee is an educated, 24-year-old employed in the business sector. During the past year, Lee was in a relationship with an intimate partner, Ex. Lee recently ended the relationship with Ex but then found that Ex was less than amicable about the split.

While the relationship was still viable, Lee elected to send three provocative “selfie” photos which involved nudity to Ex. Yesterday at work, Lee received an e mail from an unknown sender. The sender referenced photos of Lee on “shameyourex.com”¹ and made degrading and insulting remarks towards Lee. Shocked, Lee found a moment of privacy to find the website mentioned and confirmed the three photos Lee had sent to Ex during their relationship were now posted on the site with Lee's full name, work e-mail address, and a request that viewers contact and shame Lee.

That night other e-mails began to arrive from unknown senders with similar disturbing content referenced from the website. Most disturbing, however, was a phone call from one of Lee's co-workers. The co-worker told Lee that he had received a strange e-mail from an unknown sender that referred him to the website and advised him to review the photos of Lee carefully. The co-worker wanted Lee to know in case others at work were receiving similar e-mails.

At this point, Lee is distraught, embarrassed, angry and scared. In addition, Lee is worried others at work may be notified and that these events may impact Lee's status with the employer in a detrimental way. Lee then calls in sick to work the next day in hopes of finding some means to correct this problem before it causes irreparable harm.

1. This leads to several key questions:
2. How does Lee remove or have removed the photos from the web site?
3. What, if anything, should Lee do about Ex?
4. What are Lee's options under the legal system to address this matter?

This paper attempts to provide a starting point for individuals to answer these questions. It is essential that the reader understand this is NOT to be construed as legal advice and not intended to form an attorney-client relationship with any reader. Any reader in need of legal of advice in this matter should contact an attorney within their local jurisdiction to obtain legal advice.

4. THE FIRST STEPS IN LEE'S CASE

4.1 Physical Security

The first step is to determine if Lee is in danger from the posting on the site. Depending upon what identifying information is posted on the website, physical safety may be a real concern. Lee's work information was posted and the address can be found easily by looking up the business. Upon receipt of any threatening e-mail in this matter, Lee should contact the local police and specifically ask for the computer crimes unit if such an entity exists in that locale. Computer crimes officers typically have a greater knowledge of this issue and may be better able to advise on the best course of action to preserve Lee's safety and may have advice on dealing with the other issues involved. Likewise, due to the nature of the listing, building and organizational security (corporate security) should be advised in order to operate with increased vigilance. Much as in the case with domestic violence, Lee should take different routes to and from work, park in well lighted, well trafficked, areas and attempt to stay with groups of people rather than being alone. A buddy system has been used by many employees who work odd hours or late shifts, and obviously, victims of domestic violence, to escort each other to their vehicles. In this system, one person drives the other to their transportation and stays nearby until they are both safely on their way. This ensures there are always at least two persons present. Individuals should always take great care when approaching parked vehicles, especially if they are carrying objects which impede their ability to flee or fight back. There are numerous personal apps for smart phones (such as Circle 911) which may allow for rapid response in emergency which should also be explored.

A second measure may involve a restraining order. This type of request may be made at the local courthouse and will require concern about physical harm from Ex to be expressed to the court. Due to the relationship with Ex, Lee may qualify for a restraining order that would protect Lee from any contact with Ex. Different jurisdictions have different rules about restraining orders but in some states, Lee may be able to receive a restraining order for a year or more. If Lee does not feel in physical danger from Ex, it is still best to avoid contact with Ex prior to talking with a professional on this matter as contact with Ex will only encourage Ex and likely result in further complications or escalate the situation into one of physical danger.

State law determines the process by which a person can apply for and be granted a Temporary Restraining Orders (TRO) or Order of Protection. Individual state statutes express the legal requirements and threshold for obtaining the order, types or orders available, length of time an order may be in effect and how an order is enforced.

“A TRO or order of protection is a legal order issued under state law that requires a person to cease contact with another or be subject to legal penalty or consequence” as defined by womenslaw.org.

Womenslaw.org [31] indicates all states “permit the court to order the abuser to stop hurting or threatening” (another). The majority of state orders “also instruct the abuser to stay away from you, your home, your workplace or your school. (stay away provisions)”.

Many state statutes also include provisions for a court to order a “no contact order” against the abuser. Under a “no contact” provision courts typically define contact as ANY direct or indirect contact, whether positive or negative in nature as a direct violation of the order. Violations may result in a new criminal charge.

In addition to prohibiting contact, a person with the protection of a restraining order or no contact order may also ask that the alleged abuser forfeit all firearms to the local police department. Under federal law, any person with an order of protection against them may not be in possession of a firearm or ammunition. Violation of 18 U.S.C. Section 922 (g) (8) [17] is punishable by up to ten years imprisonment. A person requesting an order of protection against someone known to have firearms should alert the judge in their application. A judge can then make the order to turn over firearms immediately.

4.2 Preservation of Evidence

One of the critical elements in Lee’s case is to ensure that there is evidence of the action before attempting to get it removed from the site. Lee should act to preserve this evidence from both the site and the emails related to the site. In order to best do this, several steps should be taken by Lee:

Print out a copy of every e-mail which is received and document the date and time this email was received. If possible, turn on the option to see the email headers and include those with the printed materials.

Print out the pictures from the website into pdf format and document the date and time. This may also be done with screenshots or even video of the website live using a separate camera.

An even better approach is to use a tool which will capture the entire website which would include html, php, cgi, and other data in its entirety. Tools such as Web Preserver [6] or Page Vault [7] and others can be used. Products like this can be expensive and searching through these professional level products may be beyond the ability of many victims but professional legal consultation or private investigators may be able to assist with the preservation of this type of evidence. Note: This is not an endorsement or recommendation to use these tools but simply examples of tools which may be used.

In all cases, the entire page and as much information (metadata) about the page as can be reasonably obtained should be documented with date and time. All this information should be stored in a safe place, offline².

Forensic methodology also exists which can be utilized to preserve evidence in these cases. Tools such as Aspinwall's review of tools which provides extensive guidance on the material and metadata which may be obtained from this type of acquisition using common tools [1]. Tools such as Magnet [28] or even the use of a *manual scroll*³ can be effective in forensic acquisition. Manual scrolls can be effective and can be used to capture metadata for sites using the view source options on most web browsers. Even such options such as the Way Back Machine [29] can provide both archives of removed sites as well as API tools for the development of scripting tools which may be able to extract both website data and metadata for forensic examination.

As was indicated, the capture and preservation of the evidence in as forensically sound method as possible should be undertaken as soon as evidence becomes known. It is important that dates and times of the acquisition as well as any metadata dates and times which may be obtained are preserved and documented. If possible, private investigation services should be retained to capture this information forensically due to state statute requirements for private investigation licensing of forensic investigation in certain locales in the United States [26].

² Offline storage preserves the evidence in case the computer being used is compromised or accessible by others who may wish to delete or modify this information. Burning the information to DVD or other long lasting media and storing it in a safety deposit box or at least at another site is a recommendation.

Obviously, a great deal of this depends on the viability of the website (viz. commercial vs. homemade) type web presences which can create difficult legal positions for the presentation of obscure, difficult to document items. In addition, the ability of users to create anonymous handles and other obfuscation techniques lead this to a rapidly developing complication in the law. So-called Section 127 cases in the United Kingdom are steadily rising [30] and as such readers may wish to refer to case law in this area which references methods to discover the identities of website posters in the trolling cases there.

Much like the preservation of mobile device data, the most important aspects here are the documentation of the website itself with the material present and the date and time of the observation which may imply that at the very least the manual scroll method may be advocated as the first approach and the use of sophisticated tools for the collection of both the visual page, the underlying source code, and subsequent metadata as a second approach. Regardless, in all these cases, time is of the essence in the preservation of evidence in the dynamic environment of the internet.

In the legal sense, the use of and authentication of evidence at trial presents some obstacles to overcome. There needs to be a showing that 1) The defendant made the actual threat of posting and or disseminating the compromising photos, (either verbally, through an electronic transmission, i.e. email, text); 2) If the photos where posted on a particular site it has to be shown that it was the defendant who transmitted and posted the photos; 3) The posting was done without the victims consent; and 4) The act must be motivated by the intent to intimidate, humiliate, threaten or frighten the victim. In a civil law suit, proof of damages is required (i.e. a cause of action for Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress). For example, proof that the threatening email originated from a particular IP address indicates the origin of the transmission but cannot be tied directly to the sender. Then there is the issue of how many parties had access to the posted photos making the “travel of the posting” difficult to follow and pinpoint the origin. In short, the issue authentication of the evidence at a trial (civil or criminal) may be problematic. Under the Federal Rules of Evidence in order to adequately authenticate the evidence, the proponent must make an evidentiary showing “sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.” [18]. In authenticating electronic evidence such as emails, the proponent’s witness need not have special training but rather demonstrate sufficient knowledge that supports the evidence is what it purports it to be. However, expert testimony may add “weight” to the offered evidence. Even if the “authorship” cannot be directly proven, courts may consider circumstantial evidence as part of the authentication process as provided for in Federal Rules of Evidence 901(b)(4) [19] which allows for ... “Distinctive characteristics and the like. Appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances”. In this context. things such as comparison of other emails sent by the subject (defendant) comparing the style, use of unique information or terms known by or used by the subject, or other “markers” linking the transmission to the subject may suffice for authentication purposes. Challenges typically come from the proper chain of custody and whether there was opportunity to “tamper” with the digital images and whether the images were modified even prior to its acquisition. Hashes, in the case of dynamic web sites, may be difficult to support and may lead to more questions than answers. As was discussed earlier, care should be taken to copiously document the method by which the evidence was acquired, stored and handled, especially in manual scrolls. In a criminal trial an even finer standard is applied to the preservation of evidence and spoliation of criminal evidence is a common claim when dealing with this sort of digital evidence, regardless of the level of care. Particular care should be taken if the digital evidence was provided by a civilian such that an agency relationship did not exist prior to the civilian providing the evidence to law enforcement and as we discussed, it may be necessary to ensure that a licensed private investigator was used for this acquisition dependent upon the locale [26]. Additionally, if the civilian is determined to be acting as an agent for law enforcement, the seizure could have Fourth Amendment implications in a criminal prosecution. In the end, the possibility of alteration of digital evidence is not enough to exclude digital evidence but rather goes to the weight of evidence at trial [31]. Subsequently, it is important to show the likelihood of alteration is unlikely as with common digital forensics procedure.

In the case of web-site authentication, it is important to note that they are not “self-authenticating”. Due to the diverse nature of web sites and their manner of operation, a court will typically require the testimony of someone with specific knowledge of the web-site such as the web master or such other person familiar with the sites appearance or image.

4.3 Removal of Media from the Website

In Lee's case, the photos taken were considered "selfies". The idea of a "selfie" is important because as the "taker" of the photos, Lee would also be considered the owner of the images under current copyright law. Current copyright law protects any original work of authorship including photos [8]. Thus, as the owner, Lee has the right to request the website remove Lee's photos as they were posted by Ex, without Lee's permission. In order to do this, Lee would use the Digital Millennium Copyright Act [DMCA] "Take-Down Notice" [9]. The notice will require:

- Lee as the owner of the copyright to state his or her name
- A statement that the postings were made without proper authorization
- Lee's signature and links to the improper postings.

Once www.shameyourex.com is notified that photos were posted on the site without the consent of the owner of the photos, the website is on notice to take the photos down or be in violation of federal copyright law [10]. Websites like www.shameyourex.com that are considered "Internet Service Providers" or ISP's that comply with DMCA Take Down notices are not liable for copyright violations [11]. To avoid legal liability, ISP's must provide a mechanism to copyright owners to notify of alleged copyright violations and the ISP must respond accordingly to notifications [10]. Here, that means removing the three pictures from the site. There are even sites that provide "badging" indicators that the site complies with the DMCA.

Unfortunately, even if Lee is successful at having the photos removed from the website, links to the photos may still come up through internet search engines. To combat this problem, Lee may need to contact the individual search engines and request removal of the improper links [12].

4.4 Whack a Mole

An additional complication for Lee is the problem of "whack a mole". This is a children's arcade game where a small animal sticks its head out of a hole and is hit with a mallet. When it is struck, the head vanishes and reappears somewhere else which leads us to one of the more difficult components of the internet. Sites like www.shameyourex.com often allow for downloading of images which appeal to their viewers (or for other reasons). These images may be watermarked or not. Users of the site may be rewarded with "points" for uploading images and media to the site. Typically, points are given by the image or by the size of the media. These points may then be expended on downloads. In this light, users often create large collections of images which they can subsequently use to upload to other similar sites and earn credits there for their collection. As it is not uncommon for sites to verify files by hashes (to ensure they are not already uploaded), users may modify the images in some small way to change the hash and make the image appear unique. So, a user may see the same image of "Lee" listed on a different site as "Angel". This means that it may be exceedingly difficult, despite the DMCA, to address the issue as a popular image spreads across many sites. Despite current trends and statutes targeting revenge porn sites, many other sites are used in this way as well since they too grant download credits for uploading images. Amateur porn type sites are a common approach. Despite this no longer being "revenge" pornography per se, it may have a similar effect on the victim when an image thought removed resurfaces.

5. LEE'S NEXT STEPS

So, the first steps in this process are covered but the damage may not cease. In fact, Ex may proceed to upload the photos again as soon as they are removed and the process starts over.

What legal options are then available to Lee? The answer to that question depends in part on the state in which Lee resides. Lee should first find a competent attorney to begin to determine legal options. To find an attorney, Lee can contact the local state bar association. Because "revenge porn" is still a new area of the law, there may not be listings for lawyers under this listing. Lee can also ask for lawyers that handle domestic violence cases for victims or civil attorneys that handle tort cases.

Could Lee sue www.shameyourex.com for posting pictures of Lee without proper permission? While this area of the law is still new and evolving, the answer is likely no. If the website is considered an Internet Service Provider (ISP), the Communications Decency Act may be applicable. Section 230 of the CDA specifically says that websites cannot be held liable for certain claims that arise from content published, disseminated or made available by a third party [13]. In Lee's case, pictures were posted by Ex, a third party.

Can a copyright infringement violation for posting pictures without Lee's permission be filed? The act of violating the rights of a copyright owner is by definition copyright infringement [10]. That being said, if the website is considered an internet service provider [ISP], it will likely use the CDA section 230 as immunity from legal liability. If the website is not considered an ISP, or if the website does not comply with the DMCA take down notice, then it may not be immune from liability and a suit for copyright infringement may be viable [15]. If Lee can successfully maintain a copyright infringement lawsuit, Lee can ask the court for damages as well as attorney fees [16].

Is it possible for Ex to be arrested for violation of any criminal laws? Maybe. Again, the answer to this question depends on the state in which Lee and EX reside. Ideally, Lee lives in a state with a law that criminalizes the act of posting Lee's photo without permission and ill intention, known as a "Revenge Porn law." As more people come forward reporting these kinds of acts, states are passing statutes to criminalize the behavior and hold offenders accountable. [see Table 1: State Statutes pp. 93].

Absent a revenge porn law in Lee's state of residence, other criminal laws may be applicable such as stalking, voyeurism, fraud, and criminal invasion of privacy, however, it is often difficult to get police department to charge these crimes absent a revenge porn law or officers well trained in computer crimes. Not all police entities have officers trained to investigate crimes which take place over the internet, making detectives in a computer crimes unit most equipped to understand Lee's case. If Lee's state does not have a computer crimes unit in the police department or a revenge porn law, Lee may consider speaking to the Department of Attorney General or District Attorney. Criminal Prosecutors are well versed in the language of their state laws and may be able to direct the police how to charge Ex with a crime. (see also, Sec. 6.0, pp. 87).

If Lee's current employment is impacted, can Lee bring suit against Ex? Lee may be able to bring a civil suit for defamation, invasion of privacy, intentional infliction of emotional distress or negligent infliction of emotional distress under Lee's state law. While these suits are not criminal, Lee could sue for money damages and in some cases also ask for attorney fees if successful. However, like any lawsuit, it would be a costly venture for Lee to hire an attorney and bring a law suit without any security as to the outcome.

What if Ex lives in another State? If a case crosses state lines or if federal crimes are applicable, Lee's case may be best handled at the federal level. Copyright crimes are violations of federal law as are other crimes that cross state lines. To find out, Lee can contact the local federal authority in his or her jurisdiction or reach out to the Internet Crime Complaint Center.

6. OTHER APPROACHES

Depending upon how tightly the statute is drafted in any particular state, Lee may have approaches which may be used such as harassment, expectation of privacy, or dissemination of unlawfully captured images.

6.1 Harassment

Many states that have "revenge porn" statutes classify the offense under "Harassment" statutes making it a crime to disseminate compromising photos where the offender did so with the "with intent to harass or annoy another person" [20] [21], "with the purpose to harass, frighten, intimidate, threaten, or abuse another person," (Emphasis added). Statutes such as in Florida look to a result oriented outcome where the intent of the transmission and dissemination is to cause "emotional distress". [22]

In effect, if the offender does not do so with the requisite intent stated in the in the aforementioned harassment laws and asserts a defense that this was done rather as a "Joke", accident or some other non-harassment related motive, then these statutes will not likely help. The burden of proof becomes one of showing a pattern and intent to harass which may not be apparent if the act is a "one off" transmission without any indicia of intent to harass the victim. In many cases, however the ex-partner usually manifests ill will under highly charged emotional conditions making it less likely there would be little to no circumstantial evidence of the intent of the offender.

6.2 Expectation of Privacy

Possibly, one of the more difficult things to show is that the victim had an expectation of privacy with the transmitted images under the statute. Under the expectation of privacy analysis standard in Fourth Amendment, the courts have looked at:

- Whether a person has exhibited an actual expectation of privacy
- Whether the expectation is one that society recognizes as "reasonable." [23].

The court indicates when a person claims an expectation of privacy and then shares the personal information with a third party, that person has a dramatically diminished, if any, privacy expectation as to the shared information. Of course, this analysis relates to government activity in usurping a citizen's individual privacy in the context of a search of an individual rather than two private parties. Notwithstanding this distinction, if a victim freely and voluntarily shares compromising photos with another person, the argument can be made that the sharing of the photos indicates a much lesser expectation of privacy. It is akin to sending a third party a highly personal and sensitive letter and asking that person not to share its contents with anyone. Aside from a moral obligation not to do so, there is no legal basis precluding the disclosure. Under the North Dakota statute (see Table 1, pp.101), the offense includes lack of consent or the image was created or provided "under circumstances in which the individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy;" and "actual emotional distress or harm" is caused as a result of the dissemination. Under Texas law (see Table 1, pp. 103) the violation includes the following language “the visual material was obtained by the person or created under circumstances in which the depicted person had a reasonable expectation that the visual material would remain private;” the statute further goes on to address the consent and privacy issue by the following text, “(e) It is not a defense to prosecution under this section that the depicted person: (1) created or consented to the creation of the visual material; or (2) voluntarily transmitted the visual material to the actor.” [24] Again such circumstances pointing to privacy expectations may be belied by the fact that the victim freely provided such images to a third party despite the qualifying clause (e) noted above.

Thus, in consideration of the Fourth Amendment, Lee may consider going to the local police department for assistance. This option presents many possibilities and challenges. First, while police officers are trained to help citizens in need, many officers lack the appropriate training and resources to investigate and prepare for prosecution, a case of revenge pornography. Here’s why. First, police may fail to see the case as criminal or as a violation of privacy. Often officers see the victim at fault for taking and sharing photos or allowing photos to be taken in the first place. In other words, victims of revenge pornography have no one but themselves to blame. Second, even where police are trained to see the act as a violation of law, they may lack the legal resources to bring a charge. Most state criminal harassment and stalking laws require proof of a “course of conduct.” In other words, the state must show a pattern of behavior to successfully prosecute. In a case where only one act exists, a victim may not be protected and an offender may be untouchable. In addition, some state statutes require the existence of threats communicated directly to the victim. In the case of Lee, there was no direct communication of a threatening manner made to Lee. Again, a state statute for harassment or stalking may not provide any protection to Lee or provide offender accountability.

If Lee lived in a state with a criminal statute specifically criminalizing revenge pornography and a police department trained to handle a computer crime case- there are still challenges to consider. First, the existence of a criminal case will not slow down or stop the proliferation of the photos on the internet. Second, a criminal case is a public case, causing victims to be reluctant to follow through with charges because of the continued exploitation of the victim by attempting to hold the offender accountable. If a victim is willing to go forward, a criminal charge (unlike a civil case) has “teeth” which allow the government (police) to act and the offender risks a loss of liberty if found guilty of the crime. However, the state is constrained by the 4th amendment protection against unreasonable search and seizure. These protections seek to limit the ability of the police to conduct a search and/or a seizure of computer terminals, hard drives or other items. While the legal standard may frustrate an officer, it is imperative that officers be trained to properly investigate a computer offense in order to develop probable cause and ultimately bring a strong case to the court.

Probable cause is a level of evidence necessary on the part of the police, to support a valid search warrant. Probable cause is a “reasonable belief, based on the totality of the circumstances, that a crime has been committed and the evidence or instrumentality of that crime will be found at a specific location. A neutral and detached judge or magistrate who issues the search warrant (and therefore determines whether PC exists) bases his or her determination on the affidavit of law enforcement supporting the search warrant request. Therefore, the affidavit should contain sufficient credible information supporting the probable cause finding of the judge or magistrate that the evidence will be found at a particular place or location (the warrant itself also requires specificity as to the evidence sought and its location).

This becomes problematic if the offender cannot be reasonably be determined. In the case of Lee, it may be deduced that since the images were sent to the ex then the images were posted by the ex, but this is likely not enough. However, if there was other compelling evidence such as emails or other documentation or evidence threatening the postings or other veiled threats of retribution by the ex, there may be enough to obtain a warrant. The question then becomes how “committed” would law enforcement be in devoting time and resources to chasing down an offender, especially where there are limited resources to do so.

Offenders commonly respond to revenge porn charges by showing others had access to a computer or saying they were “hacked” by an unknown source. In the end, only a judge or jury will decide if the state has provided enough factual evidence to show the offender’s culpability. The defense only need to show a reasonable doubt – which may require educating a Judge and or jury on the mechanics of a computer crime like revenge pornography.

Finally, a revenge pornography statute may be ripe for constitutional challenges if not properly drafted. A statute that is overbroad or vague is likely to be challenged as unconstitutional. To avoid such challenges, a statute should be very specific as to the kind of conduct prohibited while avoiding language that requires a series of incidents or “course of conduct” hurdle. Finally, a statute that has teeth will punish an offender by a minimum of a year sentence (felony) rather than a misdemeanor sentence of under a year. From a public policy perspective, a misdemeanor classification sends the message to both the police as well as the victim that the crime is not as serious as a felony and may impact the amount of time and resources devoted to a successful prosecution.

6.3 Dissemination of Unlawfully Captured Images

Some states restrict the offense to those images captured without the consent of the person of whom the images were taken and where the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. Thus, if the photos of the person were voluntarily transmitted to a third party there would be no violation [25].

7. CONCLUSION

This paper provides an example case which illustrates some key steps which can be taken when a person has been the victim of revenge pornography, asks some key legal questions about actions which may be taken, and provides a summary of State Statutes which exist (in Table 1, see pp. 93) in the United States as of this date. As is evident, victims of this type of action may find it difficult to eradicate all occurrences of this material as the material has a tendency to proliferate across sites and each subsequent site will require separate action to force removal. Whilst, seemingly an impossible task, as the courts, law enforcement, and general public become increasingly aware of these types of sites, it is likely better mechanisms in both Federal, State, and Local courts will be established to assist the victim in both the removal and prosecution of their case civilly and criminally.

The reader is encouraged to pursue this matter locally and make efforts to change State laws to provide better statutes which protect victims of this type of activity. As is evident from Table 1, the current laws are often confusing and not reflective of modern ideas. The DMCA was written in 1996 and was based on the Telecommunications Act of 1934. Much has changed and will change since 1996. It is important that statutes reflect the current needs of the victims.

8. FUTURE RESEARCH

The development of “guidance language” to assist States in the development of statutes is a project which should be undertaken. Much as Lonardo et. al. learned in their efforts with Private Investigation Law [26], States seem to base statutes on those in other states regardless of the quality of the language or impact. Thus, it would seem prudent to develop some best practice guidance for both civil and criminal statutes regarding this matter.

In addition, it would be exciting to see a development of state and local statute review for easy reference. The authors believe this may be a State by State project which would result in localized guidelines which would be a starting point in each case. Each locale has various statutes relating to privacy, harassment, cyber bullying, cyber harassment, and variants of this behavior which need to be documented in a single place for use by practitioners in that locale.

As it is a massive area of the law, this paper develops many streams for further investigation. In the case of Lee, the attacker was known and as such, subject to a forward attack by the investigators and victims in this case. All too often, trolls and other anonymous attackers on the internet are unknown to the victim. Section 127 of the Communications act of 2003 in the United Kingdom is a good area for extension of this research into the prosecution of anonymous attackers. The tradeoff between privacy and libel is a complex matter which has generated a great deal of legal action during the history of the internet but as these cases continue to result in both physical and fiduciary harm to the victims, more development is needed into the how to identify and develop evidence where many of the parties are anonymous and or in other jurisdictions.

Likewise, a review of material from the psychology and criminology research, which is extensive, would be a project which may result in the establishment of baseline criteria for these abhorrent behaviors. The development of such material would assist lawmakers and attorneys in the development of more effective statutes as well as assisting developers of examination tools in the understanding of when and where this behavior will occur.

Additional complexities develop around the copyright suggestion in Lee’s case. While this may be the case, but there are certainly situations where the converse may be true and the subject does not hold copyright to the images being displayed or at least, the ownership is in question. In these cases, it may again behoove the reader to refer to the Section 127 cases in the United Kingdom which deal specifically with trolls but this may be an area of copyright law which will need to be examined more thoroughly in the future.
